'Twana's Box' can be described in many ways: a journey through a photographer's rare archive, documenting the Kurdistan region of Iraq from 1974-1992; a son's quest to find his lost father, who was murdered by a military regime; a young man's way to piece together the fragments of a scattered family in a scattered culture; the becoming of a photographer who, through the stories of others, starts to understand his own identity in times of war. 'Twana's Box' is not only the photo book that holds a selection of Twana Abdullah's archive; it is a unique insight into a time and place in a region that has since completely transformed. Rawshat has spent years piecing together his father's negatives and stories. His archival work inspired him to become a photographer himself, working for Metrography - the first independent Iraqi photo agency - before immigrating to Europe.
